Top Northern Ireland firm Caldwell & Robinson expands

Caldwell & Robinson Solicitors (www.caldwellrobinson.com), Northern Ireland leaders in family, private client, commercial and corporate law, are now an Ireland-wide firm. On 1 March they opened a new office in the Republic of Ireland's capital, Dublin, headed by eminent family lawyer Geraldine Keehan.

"Together with our office in Derry and our presence in Belfast, this move seals our position as Ireland's premier domestic and international private family law and child law firm, as well as an all-Ireland leader in corporate and business law", said Senior Partner Karen O'Leary.

Joining Caldwell & Robinson with significant experience in top family law firms in Dublin and London, Geraldine is an acknowledged expert in international and domestic family and child law, whose advice is frequently sought by colleagues, governing bodies, and charities.

Partner Geraldine Keehan said of her move: "Caldwell & Robinson has an excellent level of international and all-Ireland expertise which, in family law, has never been more relevant. I am very excited about the future; I really feel we can make a difference to the lives of our clients."

Caldwell & Robinson have been advising clients for over 100 years and are now the biggest family law practice in Northern Ireland, consistently ranked by Chambers and Partners, and one of the very few all-Ireland commercial law firms.

Commenting on the expansion across the Irish border, the firm's Managing Partner Philip Gilliland explained that "for many years we have been servicing our growing number of clients in Dublin from our office in Derry, so opening our own office in Dublin is a logical consequence of that growth. It positions us well to service the increased north-south and east-west legal activity that Brexit is bringing."
